Family violence is a pervasive public health issue with serious physical and mental health consequences for families and children. The definition of family violence varies, but broadly stated, encompasses physical, psychological, and sexual abuse against intimate partners and children. Intimate partner violence (IPV) has a lifetime prevalence rate of roughly one-third and one-quarter for U.S. women and men, respectively. In fiscal year 2012, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) reported that approximately 680,000 children experienced maltreatment, with 18 percent of cases indicating physical abuse and 9 percent indicating sexual abuse. Of the more than half a million children affected by maltreatment annually, fathers and father figures composed over one-third of maltreatment perpetrators.

Experiencing or being exposed to IPV or maltreatment is associated with short-and long-term negative outcomes, including increased risk of juvenile delinquency, arrest during adulthood (Edelson, 1999; Widom & Maxfield, 2001), mental health issues, and interpersonal relationship problems (Mills et al., 2013), with some researchers finding more pronounced effects among adolescents dually exposed to IPV and child abuse (Moylan et al., 2010; Sternberg, Baradaran, Abbott, Lamb, & Guterman, 2006).

Before violence occurs. However, to develop effective prevention programs, we must first understand which risk and protective factors are associated with family violence. The present study examined potential risk and protective factors at multiple levels of the ecology that have been found to be associated with family violence in other samples, including demographics (age, race, income, education level), background characteristics (criminal history, history of neglect, and violent socialization during childhood), and current risk factors (social integration, substance abuse, depressive symptoms, hostility toward women, and self-esteem) among a group of low-income fathers seeking services for building healthy relationships.
